External Links

The External Links area is used to reference Web sites related to a course. Use this area to showcase a list of evaluated electronic reference materials that you have discovered. You can also use External Links in conjunction with the Discussion Board. Have students send the URL of one Web site on their research topic to the Discussion Board and then post all the sites to the External Links page. Have students evaluate the Web sites and discuss whether they would be worthy of citation in their final bibliographies.

As you can see, Blackboard and similar courseware packages offer librarians an opportunity to participate more fully in the coursework of our university's students. Even if a one-hour session is all the class time a faculty member is willing to give us, we can be active members of a course, answering questions, participating in discussions, directing students in the successful completion of their research.

("Biography resources" cont. from page 35) developed by students in the anthropology program at the University of Minnesota, Mankato, as part of an e-museum. The site is "by no means a comprehensive list," but more names are added each semester. The list, arranged alphabetically, contains almost 500 names of people who have influenced anthropology. A very useful tool that is easy to navigate. Access: <http://emuseum.mnsu.edu/information/biography/>. ■
