Texas A&M University

Rice University

We ended up spending time in three, actually. In a major cooperative effort with librarians from the above universities, we enhanced and finetuned the GPO database. The result: the most accurate GPO database in existence.

Were we crazy for doing it? The hundreds of depositories already using MARCIVE's exclusive GPO database don't think so.

Give us a call. We know you'll go nuts over it.

and to the development of an information infrastructure that serves the public interest.

A long-standing principle is that copyright exists for the public good. The benefits of the new technologies should flow to the public as well as to copyright proprietors. As more information becomes available only in electronic formats, the public's legitimate right to use copyrighted material must be protected. In order for copyright truly to serve its purpose of "promoting progress," the public's right of fair use must continue in the electronic era, and these lawful uses of copyrighted works must be allowed without individual transaction fees.

Without infringing copyright, the public has a right to expect:

- to read, listen to, or view publicly marketed copyrighted material privately, on site, or remotely;

- to browse through publicly marketed copyrighted material;

- to experiment with variations of copyrighted material for fair use purposes, while preserving the integrity of the original;

- to make a first generation copy for personal use of an article or other small part of a publicly marketed copyrighted work or a work in a library's collection for such purpose as study, scholarship, or research; and

- to make transitory copies if ephemeral or incidental to a lawful use and if retained only temporarily.

Without infringing copyright, nonprofit libraries and other Section 108 libraries, on behalf of their clientele, should be able:

- to use electronic technologies to preserve copyrighted materials in their collections;

- to provide copyrighted materials as part of electronic reserve room service;

- to provide copyrighted materials as part of electronic interlibrary loan service; and

- to avoid liability, after posting appropriate copyright notices, for the unsupervised actions of their users.

Users, libraries, and educational institutions have a right to expect:

- that the terms of licenses will not restrict fair use or lawful library or educational uses;

- that U.S. government works and other public domain materials will be readily available without restrictions and at a government price not exceeding the marginal cost of dissemination; and

- that rights of use for nonprofit education apply in face-to-face teaching and in transmittal or broadcast to remote locations where educational institutions of the future must increasingly reach their students.
